Mormon Farming Life.

The Mormons inhabiting Utah and the West possess many peculiar traits of character, among the most noticable are those of colonial customs. No colony founded ties to settle upon arid lands and reclaim and always respond to the dictatorial mandates of their authorities. Scores of beautiful little cities now adorn spots in Utah that a few years ago were not regarded as fit for the habitation of Indians. The deserts have been conquered by irrigation and luxuriant vegetation covers the earth where once not even sage brush could grow.

A spirit of co-operation prevails among the Mormons to a greater extent than with any other class of colonists in the West. The organization is such that an officer presides over five lay members and counsels from superior officials as to the best policy to pursue in all Reading man matters. Colonies are organized Mary E. Lines. primarily for the advancement of church interests, which depends, of course, upon the individual success of the colonists. The irrigation canals necessary for all colonies in the West are constructed by co-operation of those interested. The products of the farm are sold and machinery purchased through the Colony life among the Mormons increases the social and moral obligations so as to make the people better. The spirit of competition is more strongly enforced in colby a systematic colonial administration.

Suit was filed in the district Messers. Seasongood & Mayer of Cincinnati, Ohio, against P. J. Cole, men for $10,000.

During 1893, Messrs. Seasongood & Mayer contracted with the Loan Commission of the territory to purchase the issue of funding bonds of April 3, of that year, amounting to if all the taxes are collected, nearly $12,000.

The entire colony cares collected with Territorial Treasurer Christy $10,000 as a security bond. The plaintiffs allege that the territory failed to carry out its part of the contract and still retains the $10,000 deposited as a bond .- Gazette
